CONTINUOUS PANEL LAYOUT

TECHNOLOGY BREAKTHROUGH

A few years ago at GA Sails, our sail designer Peter Munzlinger and the R&D team began exploring a new panel layout while developing the IQ ME with a Technora membrane.

The ME technology ensures that the Technora fibers laminated into the panels are perfectly aligned with the sail's load vectors. Since the membrane film is very thin, these fibers bear the sail's tension. Using such an expensive technology wouldn't make sense if the panels were segmented at each batten. That's why we started working on continuous panels.

Since membrane panels are specific to each sail, they are only produced once the design is finalized. This is why, during the development of the new Matrix ME, we created several prototypes using traditional materials.

With our 3D design software, which allows us to test different panel layouts on the same 3D sail mold, we were able to experiment with a wide range of configurations.

When testing these prototypes against the traditional Matrix, we immediately noticed a significant improvement in overall comfort, responsiveness, reactivity, and wind range.

When there's a load break between two panels, such as a seam at a batten junction, it creates a slight elongation that affects the sail's behavior. By eliminating these cross seams, the entire panel works uniformly, providing better load distribution.

For this reason, we have chosen to develop the new Matrix, Matrix ME, Cosmic, Vapor, and Vapor Air using this new Continuous Panels Layout to further enhance performance, stability, comfort, and wind range.

All visible panels are continuous from corner to corner, except where different materials meet. Even there, to reinforce durability and reduce load breaks, we use a 30mm double stitch.

Try our 2025 GA Sails flatwater range and experience a whole new level of feel and performance!
